Alan R. Beals is a Professor Emeritus, Sociocultural Anthropology. His Ph.D. was taken from the University of California, Berkeley, 1954. He has carried out field projects in a small town in Northern California, with an Air Force bomber crew, with the United States Army, and in Mexico. Most of his fieldwork, however, has been in Karnataka State in South India. His major interests are in cultural change, ecology, conflict and demography. He is currently conducting research into the role of decision-making, conflict and opportunity in changing agricultural communities in the United States, Mexico and India. Selected publications include Gopalpur: A South Indian Village (1980); Culture in Process (1979); An Introduction to Anthropology (1977, with R. L. Beals and H. Hoijer); Village Life in South India (1974); and Divisiveness and Social Conflict (1966), with B. J. Siegel.

Drid Williams was a professional dancer for thirty years before becoming a social anthropologist. She completed a Diploma, B. Litt. and D. Phil. from St. Hughes College, Oxford, in 1976. Author of numerous articles on the dance, liturgies and the martial arts, she has written Ten Lectures on Theories of the Dance (Scarecrow Press, 1991) and is currently editing a series of teaching texts, Readings in Anthropology of Human Movement Studies for Scarecrow Press (Anthropology and Human Movement, 1: The Study of Dances, 1996, and Anthropology and Human Movement, 2: Searching For Origins, in press). She has done fieldwork among Carmelite nuns, Dominican friars and the Royal Ballet Company in England and among Cape York Aboriginal communities in Northern Queensland. She has taught at Moi and U.S. International Universities in Kenya; at the University of Sydney, Australia and New York and Indiana Universities in the United States. Dr. Williams is founder and senior editor of the journal for the Anthropological Study of Human Movement [JASHM] since its inception (1980). She is the architect of a theory of human actions: semasiology.
